

How to Buy Fear

James J. Clarke |

Major equity indices around the world were down in the teens in the fourth quarter, with many stocks down 50% from their 52-week highs. That got our attention. When we see this type of correction, we ask ourselves:

- Did the value of the business really fall 50%?
- Is the stock going to zero?
- Was the peak a proper level to anchor to or was that too high?
- Is the current price level a bargain?

One of Wall Street's favorite clichés is: don't try to catch a falling knife. That has merit to it. After all, every stock that winds up at zero starts off by falling 50%. We know from experience that our first buy of a falling stock is very often not the low. We often expect the stock to go lower and size our initial buy accordingly. But if you think about it for a minute, unless the stock is going to zero, it is going to bottom at some point. You only know that point in hindsight, when of course it looks obvious. Very often when a stock eventually reaches that bottom it is up again very quickly, and if you haven't acted before that, you missed that gain. The broad-based equity market rebound in January 2019 highlights this point well. So yes, we will buy stocks on the way down, especially in market environments like the one we experienced in late 2018.

We certainly don't automatically buy any stock that's down 50%, but we look at them. Looking is free. We pass on the vast majority, but here's what we generally look for:

1. What does the balance sheet look like? We look at the balance sheet first, and that is usually where we stop. It usually takes less than two minutes. If you want to lose all your money with some regularity, buy stocks in free fall that have lots of debt. Those are the ones we pass on.
2. Can we understand the business? There are businesses we are happy to leave for others who will understand them better than we do. There are plenty we can understand and we stick with those.
3. Can we value the business within a range? We can't value some businesses, but for the many we can, we do so through diligent financial analysis, and then we simply compare our appraisal to the stock price.
4. Does this type of industry have a blind side? Industries that are clearly being disrupted also often turn out far worse than anybody expects.
5. Do we believe we have a behavioral edge over another investor who is selling this security to us? We remain keenly aware of behavioral biases so we don't fall victim to them.

Let's explore number five more closely. For everything we buy, somebody is selling it to us. One of us is wrong. How can we raise the odds that it isn't us?

We want to invest with people who are diligent and smart and motivated by intrinsic value analysis—but these are not the people we want to trade against. We much prefer to buy from an investor motivated by fear.

Since the stock market is anonymous, how do we find the panicky seller motivated by fear? In a bear market, they are quite easy to identify. The panicked investor is very often the one willing to sell a stock that is down 50% in six months even though the business has a strong balance sheet. We rarely see this creature in a bull market, but saw it very frequently in the fourth quarter of 2018.

The stock market is a very competitive game and we are very clearly not the only investors out there trying to buy stocks for less than the underlying business is worth. Everybody has access to the same financial statements that we do. Many investors wait for a stock to stabilize before buying—they don't buy "falling knives." When a stock is in free fall, a lot of potential buyers are likely to be sitting on the sidelines. This is a rare chance for us to be a buyer when competition is thin. So while the stock market is pretty efficient, our favorite inefficiency is buying true fear. Fear versus rational analysis is not a fair fight, and this inefficiency never gets old.

Groupthink is bad, especially at investment management firms. Brandywine Global therefore takes special care to ensure our corporate culture and investment processes support the articulation of diverse viewpoints. This blog is no different. The opinions expressed by our bloggers may sometimes challenge active positioning within one or more of our strategies. Each blogger represents one market view amongst many expressed at Brandywine Global. Although individual opinions will differ, our investment process and macro outlook will remain driven by a team approach.

©2024 Brandywine Global Investment Management, LLC. All Rights Reserved.

Social Media Guidelines

Brandywine Global Investment Management, LLC ("Brandywine Global") is an investment adviser registered with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission ("SEC"). Brandywine Global may use Social Media sites to convey relevant information regarding portfolio manager insights, corporate information and other content.

Any content published or views expressed by Brandywine Global on any Social Media platform are for informational purposes only and subject to change based on market and economic conditions as well as other factors. They are not intended as a complete analysis of every material fact regarding any country, region, market, industry, investment or strategy. This information should not be considered a solicitation or an offer to provide any Brandywine Global service in any jurisdiction where it would be unlawful to do so under the laws of that jurisdiction. Additionally, any views expressed by Brandywine Global or its employees should not be construed as investment advice or a recommendation for any specific security or sector.

Brandywine Global will monitor its Social Media pages and any third-party content or comments posted on its Social Media pages. Brandywine Global reserves the right to delete any comment or post that it, in its sole discretion, deems inappropriate or prevent from posting any person who posts inappropriate or offensive content. Any opinions expressed by persons submitting comments don't necessarily represent the views of Brandywine Global. Brandywine Global is not affiliated with any of the Social Media sites it uses and is, therefore, not responsible for the content, terms of use or privacy or security policies of such sites. You are advised to review such terms and policies.